

SHARON OLSON

One Fine Day
for Peggy

A Renaissance painter might have captured it this way: a tableau along the canal bank, the two of us in black leggings posing as courtiers, the blue heron we stumbled upon almost as tall as us, nonchalant as an adolescent in a feathered cap, one leg expertly drawn up, his grass stalk reflectively chewed. Vehicles on the bridge lumbered on the wood planks but far enough away to be silent.

In the next scene we pretended to have mastered self-portraiture in a convex mirror, distorting our faces as the Mannerists liked to do, pressing the camera icon repeatedly to get the best shot, leaving out of course the dike, the heron, even the painter if he had really been there, leaving only a small piece of the sky, shorthand for the fullness we all at once perceived.
